

When Is the Best Time to Renovate Your Home?

October 10, 2014

Some things are easy to determine, and some questions are easy to answer. For many homeowners, however, figuring out when the best time is to renovate a home isn't always among them. If you're considering a renovation project, you're sure to have a wide array of questions and concerns, and one of them is likely to be related to the best time to begin the work. Unless you're facing a renovation which is necessary as a result of damage or part of an urgent repair project, there are a few factors which will all contribute to proper renovation timing.

Budgeting, Finances and Lifestyle Considerations

For non-urgent home renovations, it can be all too easy to procrastinate until it does become a matter of some urgency. This can not only leave you with a larger project on your hands than you first intended, but can also put you in a less comfortable position financially. At the same time, taking on a project immediately after moving into a new home doesn't give you a chance to live in the space and make informed decisions about the areas where more attention is warranted.

Timing Your Project

Ultimately, the best time for you to renovate your home is when you've carefully considered the most concerns, balanced your budget and made time for the disruption of building. When determining your renovations schedule, be sure to also allow for time spent obtaining council approval and permits before work begins.
